SIMPLE AS THAT
Official certified publication

Skipping the Congo, Haiti, and Sudan is the right call when the point of the trip is to relax.

By Tim BC · October 5, 2026
https://simple-as-that.net/posts/skipping-the-congo-haiti-and-sudan-is-the-right-call-when-the-point-of-the-trip-is-to-relax

Skipping the Congo, Haiti, and Sudan is the right call when the point of the trip is to relax. Violence and danger sit in the way of every ordinary vacation move, and a place that blocks those moves cannot deliver rest. Walking out after dark, taking a road that is not pre-cleared, leaving a bag in a room, and trusting that the airport will still be open on the return date are the baseline of a trip that works. Those three countries fail that baseline. The failure is not a side note. It is the condition of the visit.

What a relaxing trip actually requires

Rest needs predictable streets. A street is predictable when a person can leave the building, cross to a shop, and come back without negotiating passage. It needs working phones, so a delay is a message and not a disappearance. It needs open clinics, so a fever or a cut has a door that opens and a shelf that holds the usual medicines. It needs a flight that leaves on schedule, so the end of the trip is a time on a ticket and not a hope. Remove any one of those and the day stops being free. Remove all of them and the day becomes a sequence of checks: whether the road is open, whether the power is on, whether the exit still exists. That sequence is the opposite of relaxation. The Congo, Haiti, and Sudan trade the whole set for checkpoints, blackouts, and the chance the plan ends early.

Ordinary moves that violence blocks

Walking out after dark is the first ordinary move that fails. A calm evening depends on light, on other people doing the same walk, and on the absence of anyone whose job is to stop the walker. Where violence is the operating condition, dark is a closed hour. The walk becomes a calculation, and a calculation is not rest. Taking a road that is not pre-cleared is the second failure. A vacation road is a line on a map that a driver can follow. A dangerous road is a line that may be cut, taxed, or watched. The traveler does not choose the scenery. The traveler waits to be told whether the line still exists. Leaving a bag in a room is the third failure. A room that holds a bag is a room with a latch, a staffed desk, and a presumption that the bag will be there in the morning. Where control of the street is contested, that presumption drops. The bag has to travel with the person, and the person has to stay with the bag. Trusting the airport is the fourth failure. A return date is only real if the strip is open, the staff are present, and the flight is not cancelled because the road to the strip closed or the city around it shifted. Violence makes that trust a bet.

The Congo

In the Congo the east stays unstable. Instability there is not a headline that fades by afternoon. It is the standing condition of the roads and the hills. Roads close without notice, so a morning plan to move from one town to the next can end at a barrier that was not there the day before. Armed groups make whole stretches of the country a place where movement itself is the risk. The risk is not limited to a single neighborhood or a single night. It attaches to the act of going. A park on a map does not override that. A lodge booking does not override that. The traveler who treats the east as a destination is treating movement as safe in a place where movement is the exposure. Power and water follow the same pattern of interruption. A clinic that should hold the usual medicines can be locked. A phone that should send a location can sit on an empty signal. The return depends on a strip that can be reached and a plane that is still scheduled. None of that is guaranteed once the road behind the traveler closes. The Congo is a bad place to visit for rest because the visit cannot be separated from the instability.

Haiti

Haiti's capital and the roads out of it run on gang control. Gang control means the street is not a public space with a single set of rules. It is a set of blocks whose rules change with whoever holds them that week. A hotel stay can turn into a lockdown the moment a neighborhood fight spills. The lockdown is not a drill. It is the door staying shut, the desk telling guests to remain inside, and the plan for the day cancelled because the block outside is no longer passable. The roads out of the capital carry the same control. A drive to a beach, a site, or the airport is a drive across territory that is not neutral. The bag in the room is only as safe as the block. The phone is only as useful as the network that may drop when the block flares. Clinics do not stay reliably open when staff cannot cross the same streets. The flight home is only real if the road to it stays open through the morning of departure. Haiti fails the vacation test at the capital and again on every road that leaves it.

Sudan

Sudan is an active war. Cities are hit. Supply lines are cut. An active war is not a travel warning layered on top of a functioning country. It is the replacement of ordinary movement with military movement. A city that is hit is a city where the hotel, the market, and the clinic are in the same strike pattern as the positions being fought over. A cut supply line is a pharmacy that runs out, a fuel pump that stays dry, and a road that carries convoys instead of visitors. There is no reliable way to get out once the fighting shifts. The shift does not wait for a booking window. An airport that was open at booking can be closed, contested, or unreachable by the week of travel. Phones fail when towers are down. Streets stop being predictable when they are avenues of advance. The return ticket becomes a piece of paper. Sudan is the clearest of the three cases: the danger is not adjacent to the trip. The danger is the condition the trip would enter.

Checkpoints, blackouts, and early endings

Those three places trade predictable streets, working phones, open clinics, and scheduled flights for checkpoints, blackouts, and the chance the plan ends early. A checkpoint is a stop the traveler does not control. It adds time, it adds cost, and it adds the possibility that the stop is the end of the forward movement. A blackout removes the light, the fan, the charge on the phone, and the pump on the water. It turns an evening into a wait. An early ending is the practical form of the danger. The road closes behind the traveler. The flight is cancelled with no replacement. The hotel becomes a place to stay inside rather than a place to leave from in the morning. Each of those outcomes is counterproductive to relaxation because relaxation assumes the day will finish as planned. A day that might be cut short cannot be spent loosely. It is spent watching the exit.

Why the combination kills the point of going

The combination kills the point of going. A trip taken for rest spends its value on unstructured time: a walk, a meal, a room that can be left and returned to, a schedule with slack. Violence spends that value on vigilance. The traveler who has to confirm the road, confirm the block, confirm the clinic, and confirm the flight has already spent the day on the work the trip was meant to avoid. Doing that work in the Congo, in Haiti, and in Sudan is not a trade for a view or a cheaper fare. It is the whole content of the visit. The danger is not a tax added to an otherwise free day. It is the day. That is why the violence and danger are counterproductive to relaxation. They do not sit beside the holiday. They replace it.

What staying away keeps

Staying away keeps the days free for somewhere the only decision is where to eat. That decision is small on purpose. It assumes the street outside is usable, the phone in the pocket works, the clinic across town is open if needed, and the flight at the end of the week is still on the board. The Congo does not offer that set. Haiti does not offer that set. Sudan does not offer that set. Choosing other ground is not a lesser version of the same trip. It is the trip that can still be a rest. The unused ticket for those three places is the correct ticket. The plan that never starts there is the plan that can finish on time.

The consequence is already set. The Congo, Haiti, and Sudan stay off the list for any trip whose purpose is to relax. Violence in the east of the Congo, gang control in Haiti's capital and on the roads out, and active war in Sudan block the ordinary moves a holiday is made of. Checkpoints, blackouts, and early endings are what those countries put in place of predictable streets, working phones, open clinics, and a flight that leaves on schedule. Staying away leaves the days for a place where the only decision left is where to eat.

Certified on simple-as-that.net. This PDF is the full article.